This is essentially the risk-need-responsivity (RNR) concept where the risk and needs of the offender should drive the selection of an appropriate program that can address the criminogenic factors. The RNR grew out of the treatment classification literature that was developed in the 1960s and 1970s by Lee Sechrest, Ted Palmer, and others.

Numerous risk scales are currently used in the United States to assess static risk factors and criminogenic needs (dynamic risk factors that are related to the client's propensity for criminal behavior), of which substance abuse is but one.
